HARVARD'S EARLY BURST OF SPEED KILLED OFF YALE

Crimson's Plan to Row Eli Off Her Feet Succeeded—Griswold Made Game Effort to Stick It Out.

ARVARD beat Yale yesterday because coward the finish. But even that is doubtful. Yale tried doggedly to hold on, and two other men in the boat were nearly ready to collapse when Stroke Griswold went over.

anything but a quitter. He was trained too fine a month before the race, and it was rotten judgment that put him in the boat. When the strain of that terrific two-mile spurt broke him down he fell forward over his oar. This was at about two and a quarter miles. For a couple of minutes the rest rowed on. Then Griswold made a desperate effort to catch the stroke, took two feeble swings This is his fourth year at Cambridge, with his body, and fell backward against the knees of No. 7. like action yesterday. When the time set for the start came Harvard leisurely came down to the starting points all ready. Over at one side of the river the Yale crew, in a launch, waited for just eleven minutes before getting into their boat at all. Then they rowed their boat at all. Then they rowed and drifted leisurely across to the mark. In all, they kept the Harvard men waiting about twenty minutes. Sitting in a shell for twenty minutes before a race, waiting, is enough to stiffen a crew and take the snap out of it. This sort of trickery is common in professional sport, but there is no excuse for indulging in it in events between amateurs. Yale did the same thing between halves in the last Princeton game.
